▌ Admission Policy ▌

Owing to the advancement and spread of computers and information processing technology, information science has become an important academic discipline that provides a fundamental scientific methodology comparable to mathematics and physics. Moreover, progress in information science has permeated various aspects of our daily life and has been influential not only to industries in general, but also to our society, culture, and economy. On the other front, electrical and electronic engineering has a long and distinguished history in supporting extensive industrial fields. It has continuously contributed as a matrix of information industry and produced extremely sophisticated, complicated, and large-in-scale electrical and electronic systems. Electrical and electronic engineering is expected to further develop in close cooperation with information science. To respond to such social demands, the Graduate School of Information Science and Electrical Engineering aims to educate next generation researchers and engineers with comprehensive, broad vision, in−depth expertise and research and development capability in each specialized field. We admit students with a strong will to learn in order to meet such requirements.
